NEEDS ASSESSMENT

The mental health field has predominantly focused on psychopathology and individually-based treatment approaches. Attention to the family has tended to be deficit-focused, skewed toward family dysfunction. There is a gap in knowledge and application of recent strengths-based multi-level approaches that engage families collaboratively for effective intervention. This presentation provides an overview of these advances and their application in training, practice, and research.

LEARNING OBJECTIVES

At the conclusion of this activity, participants will be able to:

1. Learn advances in family systems theory, practice, and research.
2. Gain new knowledge of research-informed family resilience framework, integrating developmental and multi-level systems perspectives.
3. Learn applications in situations of adversity: a) trauma, loss, major disasters, war, and refugee experience; b) disruptive family transitions; and c) chronic multi-stress conditions.
