

So my name is Brita Roy. I'm an assistant professor of medicine within the section of general internal medicine.

My interest is in addressing health disparities using a positive health approach and so with addressing disparities really comes the necessity of having diversity of ideas and people as well as a really collaborative atmosphere.

I think the Yale internal medicine community is a very welcoming community. One thing I really like about the internal medicine group is that they're innovative, especially when it comes to education.

The Yale internal medicine program has created some of the curricula that many, many other residency programs use around the country.

One project that I do work on is using a community resilience model to address disparities in exposure to gun violence in the city of New Haven. So, we partner with a variety of community members and organizations around the city, aiming to use social ties to strengthen some of the lowest income neighborhoods with the goal of reducing violent crime.
